

LOSERS

Economy

The news got worse. The baht hit a six-year low to near 35 per US dollar, not what authorities had planned. Foreign and Thai money fled the stock market, and investment froze. The prime minister sounded more like a football owner than politician. He didn't promise to get rid of the coach and get a better goalkeeper. He didn't say he had confidence in the current team, either. It was noted, carefully, that a government which always gets the results it wants from opinion polls saw an interesting result from a Bangkok University Poll last week. A strong majority of the country want a cabinet reshuffle. The general will decide if, when and who, and no one can influence him.